There are Codes of Ethics and there is Radical Ethics; the latter does not always coincide with the former but emerges as situational embodied response to the presence of another.

You could transgress a rule and be ethical. You can follow a Code and be unethical. Radical ethics is another name for hospitality and the work of a therapist that of a host.

Who is a good host? One who understands deeply that she is a guest on Earth. What do we really mean when we say 'welcome'? Welcome to my territory? Or 'you and I are both guests - of psyche, of this transient space of mutual healing'?

At the workshop we will explore radical ethics through experiential exercises and discussion.

Dr Manu Bazzano

is a writer, supervisor and lecturer at Roehampton University, London. He also offers person-centred/existential counselling and psychotherapy and works with individuals, couples and groups. He has practised meditation since 1980 and in January 2004 was ordained as a Zen monk in both the Soto and Rinzai traditions. He facilitates workshops integrating meditation and humanistic therapy:
